CONFERENCE OVERVIEW

Global economic cooperation faces unprecedented challenges. Trade wars have disrupted supply chains and increased business uncertainty. Brexit, the U.S. departure from the Trans-Pacific Partnership, and U.S. disengagement from the World Trade Organization have generated doubts about the future of global economic governance. Populism is pushing nations inward, just as the rise of China and the Covid pandemic demand coordinated global responses. National security concerns in the technology sector add another layer of complexity to global economic policymaking.

Academic research and policy analysis can illuminate the sources of these challenges and identify tractable policy and institutional responses to the threats that imperil global cooperation. Research and policy discussions are also relevant to business leaders, who must navigate uncertain global markets and anticipate the policies of the new Administration.

PURPOSE OF THE EVENT

The purpose of this 3.5-hour virtual event is to bring together leading academics, policy analysts, and business leaders to consider some of these major challenges in the global trading system.

The event has two goals. First, it aims to bridge scholarship and policymaking: inform policy audiences about latest policy-relevant academic research findings around some of these challenging areas in world trade; and, conversely, educate academics about the burning policy questions policy audiences are asking.

Second, this event seeks to provide business leaders of global companies actionable and rigorous information on the future direction of U.S. and global trade policies, and fresh ideas on concrete responses to the divisive debates and social issues surrounding trade.

Each of the three sessions will feature:

- 1. 3-4 presenters of recent salient academic research who will also discuss the policy implications of their work
- 2. Panel of policy experts and business leaders who will reflect how these research findings help improve trade policy thinking and making
- 3. Generate broader discussion on the presented research and needs for future research

The event will conclude with comments from the CCD Leadership.
